sentinels stood watch over the sleeping men They would sound an alarm should occasion demand in ample time to arouse the sleepers if an enemy's head appeared in the darkness Hal and Chester of course left the American trenches with full knowledge of these sentinels otherwise they might have been shot Once beyond the protecting walls of earth they moved swiftly and silently toward the German trenches less than a hundred feet away just the distance from the home plate to first base on a baseball diamond as Hal put it ninety feet These two lads who now advanced directly toward the foe were lieutenants in the first American expeditionary force to reach France to lend a hand in driving back the legions of the German Emperor who still clung tenaciously to territory he had conquered in the early stages of the great war These boys had at one time been captains in the British army and had had three years of strenuous times and exciting adventures in the greatest of all wars Their captaincies they'd won through gallant action upon the field of battle American lads they had been left in Berlin at the outbreak of hostilities when they were separated from Hal's mother They made their way to Belgium where for a time they saw service with King Albert's troops Later they fought under the tricolor with the Russians and the British and Canadians When the United States declared war on Germany Hal and Chester with others were sent to America where they were of great assistance in training men Uncle Sam had selected to officer his troops They had relinquished their rank in the British army to be able to do this Now they found themselves again on French soil but fighting under the Stars and Stripes On this particular night they advanced toward the German lines soon after an audience with General John J Pershing commander in chief of the American expeditionary forces In one hand Chester carried a little hardwood box to which were attached coils of wire In the other hand the lad held a revolver Hal likewise carried his automatic in his hand Each was determined to give a good account of himself should his presence be discovered It was unusually quiet along the front this night It was too dark for opposing snipers sharpshooters to get in their work and the voices of the big guns which almost incessantly for the last few weeks had hurled shells across the intervening distance between the two lines of trenches were stilled
