Abstract

The consequence of some developments in the life sciences, for example genetics, have made them amongst the most controversial in today's society. Despite the discussion about pro and contra arguments, the demand for life science expertise increases creating a growing need for life science education. In order to develop expertise in the complex domain of life sciences, learners need better access to science education.

In this paper, an approach to science education is suggested that combines guided knowledge acquisition with hands-on experience. Although the need for authentic scientific learning is advocated by researchers, teachers, politicians and institutions, daily school practice, characterized by financial and organizational constraints, prevents holistic learning experiences. Technology partly helps to overcome such obstacles. In this
