

Taking the book as a whole, it has to be said that there are shortcomings and some errors. There is no mention of the ommochromes at all; these were discovered by Becker in 1942 and have been the subject of a great deal of work by Butenandt and his school since 1957.

The tetrapyrrole pigments are given cursory treatment in the new supplement, despite the appreciable published work that has appeared since the first edition. This makes the chapter dealing with these pigments considerably out of date, particularly with reference to porphyrin and haem biosynthesis. There is still a serious error on page 266, in which turacin, the copper chelate of uroporphyrin III, is described as a salt.

The book and its supplements lean heavily towards the carotenoids—not unnaturally, since Denis Fox is an authority on these pigments and most of his work has been done in this field. The sections on structural colours, including Tyndall scattering and iridescence, are particularly good, and the bibliography as a whole contains many references that would be difficult to find de novo. There is a most useful folding table of structural colours and pigments. The general quality and binding of the new book are below that of the elegant original by C.U.P., although the text of the old part appears to have been reproduced photographically, including the pagination.

The dust-wrapper bears a remark by an earlier reviewer that reads: 'Professor Fox . . . has written with a zest that betrays his own delight in the subject'. This is, indeed, the really outstanding feature of the book, and one has only to be in the company of the author for a matter of minutes to appreciate his colourful personality and dedication.

'What skilful limner e'er would choose
To paint the rainbow's varying hues—
Unless to mortal it were given
To dip his brush in dyes of heaven?'

The Biology of the Nocardiae

M. GOODFELLOW, G. H. BROWNELL and J. A. SERRANO (Editors)

Academic Press, London, New York and San Francisco, 1976, pp. 517, £15.00

The preface of this multi-author work tells us that 'the nocardiae deserve recognition in their own right'. It is therefore ironic that the theme uniting most of the chapters is precisely the problem of recognizing the nocardiae as a distinct group of bacteria: one-third of the 18 chapters are directly concerned with taxonomy, and another third make considerable play of the taxonomic implications of the subject matter, be it micromorphology, cell-wall composition, lipid composition, host-phage relationships, DNA-reassociation studies or metabolism. It is bad luck that the genus Nocardia apparently finds itself without an adequate type species: we are told (page 28) that Nocardia farcinica, first isolated from cases of bovine farcy in Guadeloupe, no longer corresponds with its original description, and that 'unfortunately' farcy no longer exists in Guadeloupe.

Many of the authors, conscious of the difficulty of delimiting their subject matter, opt to talk about members of four groups of bacteria belonging to the genera Corynebacterium, Mycobacterium and Nocardia (sensu stricto) and a series of strains referred to as 'the rodochrous complex'. This recently proposed grouping accommodates certain members of each of the other three genera (and some others); courage is presently being
