

INTRODUCTION

[Rusian interest was shown in France in the revolutionary movement which convulsed the immense Russian Empire in the year 1905.] The critical situation of the mighty fortress of autocracy preoccupied French politicians, financiers, and socialists. They talked and wrote about the problems of Russia; they proposed remedies; and they made predictions. It was in this year that Victor Bernard published his L'empire russe et le monde and Alexander Ulmer his révolution russe to meet the pressing demand for information about that mysterious empire of the East, known as Russia. French politicians deplored the scanty knowledge of their compatriots about things Russian; they encouraged them to study the social and economic conditions in that country.

[The main reasons for the French interest in the internal situation in Russia were three, namely, (1) The existence of the Franco-Russian Alliance, (2) the French capital invested in Russia, and (3) the sympathy of the French Socialists. The revolutionary agitation in Russia would indisputably affect France on account of the political and financial relations between the two states. The French Socialists, openly sympathizing with their Russian counterparts, had greatly aided in enhancing the magnitude of the revolution before the French public.] By their press, their public meetings, and their resolutions, they made their influence felt in the shaping of popular opinion.
