

The methodology centers around household activities in several income groups and how these activities are linked to energy-use processes and the use of primary energy. The methodology is used for illustrating the effects of urbanization on the use of primary fuels, for projecting future energy demands associated with household activities in different income groups, for assessing alternative government policies in terms of their effect on primary energy consumption, and for evaluating the potential impact of energy shortages on the activities of people in different income groups.

The authors construct energy-use profiles for different income groups and then examine each income group's activities to determine the associated end-use demands: transportation, food, housing, residential uses, and public services. They next determine the primary energy inputs required by the activities (oil based, electric, and non-commercial). All estimates are based on information obtained from observation and interviews. After the approach is explained in detail and applied to Mexico City, the authors project energy demand to 1990.

2-012 REPORT ON ENERGY FLOW ON SMALL FARMS

N. W. Axinn (Project Leader) and G. H. Axinn (Collaborator), Institute of Agriculture and Animal Science, Rampur, Nepal. June 1978, 37 pp.

In this report, data gathered in several studies of small farms in Nepal are analyzed to identify the energy balances that develop in a nearly closed ecosystem, or a subsistence farm. Major attention is given to oxen as a secondary source of farm power and to firewood as a major fuel input. The authors' hypothesis is that the efficiency of energy conversion is an index of development and that the quantity of energy converted correlates with the socioeconomic status of the farmer.

Data on firewood use were collected by interviewing all the families living in three hamlets. The cost-benefit data for the oxen were gathered by interviewing 69 families in the Terai region and 70 farm families in the hills.

The final report of the study includes a general description of small farms in Nepal, a discussion of energy balances, a chapter on bullocks as a secondary source of farm power, and a section on firewood.
