

Causality results are very interesting in our analysis. VAR based Granger Causality results show that causality runs from investment and educational expenditures towards employment. Direction of causality is from number of hospitals to total enrollment, from number of hospitals and employment to investment. According to VECM based Granger causality, it moves from investment to number of hospitals; from investment, total enrollment, number of hospitals and employment to educational expenditures by government in the short run. Short run causality also runs from number of hospitals to investment.

On the basis of results, it is suggested that government should increase the proportion of expenditure on health and education because these two factors are most favorable for the economy in terms of growth rates and employment level. Higher investment will directly lead to higher employment rates while number of hospitals and higher enrollment rates in education both play vital role in enhancing employment. Government should simultaneously concentrate on all these variables to attain its macroeconomic objectives.
