Only the provision of a better view for the pilot, or a reduction in frontal area, might justify the disposition of the 1912 Canton Unné 110/130 hp radial aero engine with its vertical crankshaft and angled drive, a necessary corollary of which was water cooling for the cylinders—to which another French maker of radials (Salmson) later became addicted. Salmson also employed another feature of this Canton Unné that was much more endearing in principle if ruinous in practice: instead of master and slaves among the connecting rods, their disparate motions provoking secondary vibrations, there was a planetary gearset that served to prevent disturbance by making them all slaves. Such egalitarianism could not prosper even in its maternal republic.
