

pattern characteristic of a Western Bantu adaptation. Huffman concludes that both Eastern Bantu cattle keepers and Western Bantu horticulturalists occupied this area, sometimes alternatively, sometimes together. In the 13th and 14th centuries A.D., both language groups were present. Using the early dates for his sites, he also argues that cattle keeping was important to Eastern Bantu peoples well before the Late Iron Age. This book will be of most interest to other archaeologists, as well as to precolonial historians. It presents a number of provocative ideas about methods of ceramic analysis, culture-historical reconstruction, and Iron Age population movements that will continue to be of interest for some time to come.

LITERATURE

Abena P. A. Busia. Testimonies of Exile. Trenton, New Jersey: Africa World Press, 1990. 90 pp. Illustrations. $7.95. Paper.

Divided into three sections—"Exiles," "Incantations for Mawu's Daughters," and "Altar Call"—Abena P.A. Busia's collection of poetry gives the impression of having been written intermittently over a span of years; thus, it forms an interesting collage of reminiscences, eulogies, testimonials, and remonstrations that mark critical junctures in the life of the writer, both cataloguing her despair and delineating the sources of her strength and liberation. The title of the collection, which is taken from the first section of the volume, examines the condition of the African emigre and its effect on family, culture, and the establishment of personhood. The poem "Caliban," which opens part one of the collection, figuratively describes the exile as bound by a foreign language that produces the aberration of mongrelism comparable to that of the Shakespearean character for whom the poem is named. This condition extends beyond the writer to include family members and other African sojourners whose paths have crossed the writer's in a number of foreign lands but whose voyages have not yet taken them homeward. The writer declares in the poem: "All my friends are exiles...With the globe at our command,/ we have everywhere to go,/ but home" (p. 11). Exile is also figuratively depicted in the poem "At Last Rites" as a form of dismemberment that "[splits] my body among continents" (p. 22).

Political instability in the form of coups and counter-coups produces the self-imposed exile; likewise, the engagement of African men in nationalist politics in hopes of securing their homeland for future generations produces abandoned wives and mothers in foreign territories whose loneliness is assuaged by the female friendship that is
