to take and when she felt insecure or didn't get what she wanted she became defensive or cold. As time passed the partner began to understand that the daughter of the narcissistic woman was incapable of loving sincerely. Every interaction with her felt like a test of submission and validation and when he tried to tell her how he truly felt she responded with indifference or criticism as if nothing was ever good enough for her. If he failed to meet her expectations or didn't react the way she wanted she became cold or began emotionally manipulating him making him feel guilty for not providing the idealized fulfillment she was seeking. He had begun to realize that the daughter of the narcissistic woman didn't need genuine love but admiration and control. Every attempt to love her was turned into a tool of manipulation. Despite his efforts to understand her he could never see her as a truly beautiful woman not because she didn't have attractive physical features but because there was nothing real behind that appearance. He saw how the narcissistic daughter built a universe around herself a universe where everything revolved around her needs and he wasn't part of that universe. Her beauty was never about being vulnerable or open but about creating a perfect image an image meant to serve her selfish goals. In his eyes she represented nothing but a hurt and confused girl incapable of authentic love a woman protecting herself by distorting reality and refusing to acknowledge her own imperfections. This was not a beauty that came from a place of inner peace but from a constant need for external validation. She masked her true fears and insecurities with a shell and an ideal of human perfection making it impossible for real deep love to thrive. And the more he realized this mechanism the clearer it became that he could never truly love her because love could not flourish in an environment infested with manipulation fear of abandonment and the need for control. In their relationship he learned to protect himself not only by maintaining his boundaries but also by becoming increasingly emotionally distant. He knew that no matter how much he tried to love her it would never be enough. Not because he didn't want to but because the daughter of the narcissistic woman was incapable of offering sincere love and any form of love she gave was merely a means of manipulating him of keeping him caught in her games. He protected himself from each attempt to be influenced by her emotions avoiding becoming vulnerable to her need for control. He could never love her because love requires vulnerability the ability to open your heart in a way that your partner doesn't make you feel insecure or controlled. The daughter of the narcissistic woman was incapable of such authentic openness and her love was merely a tool to validate her own fears and insecurities. To him love should have been a mutual exchange but in their relationship everything revolved around a constant need to be adored to be seen as special without being willing to give anything in return. And even though there were moments when he wished things were different even though he wished he could love her for who she truly was he knew that would never be possible. She didn't want true love she only wanted admiration and control and to him that kind of love made no sense.
