INTRODUCTION

Spacecraft and groundbased observations of the atmospheres of solar system objects have provided a definition of their present characteristics and have yielded clues about their past history. Table 1 presents a summary of our current knowledge of the atmospheric properties of all the planets, except Pluto, and several satellites. The masses of these atmospheres range from the very miniscule values for the Moon, Mercury, and Io, to the more substantial values for the Earth, Venus, Mars, and Titan, to the very large values for the giant planets, where the atmosphere constitutes a significant fraction of the total planetary mass. The compositions of these atmospheres encompass ones dominated by rare gases (the Moon and Mercury), ones containing highly oxidized compounds of carbon, nitrogen, and sulfur (the outer three terrestrial planets and Io), and ones with highly reduced gases (Titan and the giant planets). What factors account for this enormous diversity in properties?

There are reasons for thinking that in the past these atmospheres were quite different from their present state. For example, it is considered highly unlikely, if not impossible, for the chemical steps that led to the origin of life on the Earth to have occurred with the current, highly oxidized atmosphere. Rather, an early, somewhat reducing atmosphere needs to be postulated (Miller & Orgel 1974). In the case of Mars, certain
