

History and philosophy of geography

by Thomas F. Glick

There are manifold signs that the history of geography has come of age as an independent subdiscipline. To name some of the more visible proofs of this contention: Geoffrey Martin's History of Geography Newsletter; the success of Bibliographical Studies and other activities of the IGU working group on the history of geographical thought; the emergence of geographers who practice the history of geography as an exclusive research interest, together with a legion of colleagues for whom history of the field is a significant interest; joint appointments in geography of historians with a strong interest in history of geography; large-scale specialized symposia on the subject (e.g. Blouet, 1981); and the broadening of contacts between historians of geography and historians of science.

From a cognitive standpoint, the latter is the most significant development for before the history of geography had been too isolated to achieve intellectually valid results. As Aay (1978, 4, 57, 81) has noted, practitioners of history of geography within the discipline, whose writing and teaching primarily rendered an 'in-house' service (that of supporting required courses), had for too long been sheltered from 'precisely those intellectual currents most material to its academic independence and maturity'. Academic geography has been the last of the social sciences to professionalize its own history.

Why has a 'new' history of geography emerged at this precise moment? Aay, the foremost student of the phenomenon, gives two plausible answers. First, philosophical uncertainty is a major stimulus to historical soul searching within a discipline (1978; 54–55). Were we to chart production of historical articles to produce a crude index of uncertainty, we could then test this hypothesis by comparing it to statements made by geographers indicative of their emotional state. If correct, the conclusion would be that the crisis of neopositivist geography has been the main stimulus to recent historical interest. On the other hand, if one accepts Johnston's concept of a 'rolling programme' (see below) as the normative way that research modes succeed one another in the social sciences, then today would seem no more critical a period than others over the past 60 years.

Aay's second hypothesis, implicit in his assessment of the presence of 'development research context' (that is, explicit awareness of the history of one's own research) in the articles of American geographers, is more interesting. In comparing
