Matching Resources to Needs in Community Care Bleddyn Davies, David Challis, 2018-08-09 First published in 1986 Matching Resources to Needs describes the PSSRU's community care approach and analyses the first of the community care projects a seminal set of experiments in the care of the elderly at high risk of institutional long term care The experiments create field structures which provide incentives to improve efficiency decentralised power over resources being balanced by enhanced accountability The first part explains the approach analyses the causes of inefficiency in British social care and reviews British and American evidence about the relationships between resources recipient characteristics and outcomes The approach is compared with some two dozen American experiments hitherto unknown in the UK It describes the design of the project and its evaluation The authors then examine the experimental results They show that cost and welfare effects are better and the costs of outcomes are lower for recipients of community care The third part of the book uses observational and other data to explore the relationships between structures assumptive worlds causal processes and outcomes and their costs It also analyses the performance of the core tasks of entrepreneurial case management for types of case The book concludes with a discussion of the broader implications of this approach to community care

Gender and Community Care Joan Orme, 2000-11-16 Are there differences in the way that men and women care Are the care needs of women and men perceived as being different What do we mean by community Is being cared for always a positive experience How can social workers and social care workers work positively with individual differences Much has been written about both the formal and informal provision of community care and women's role within this However less attention has been paid to the users of community care services Usually described in terms of being old disabled or experiencing mental health problems service users are assumed to fit into homogeneous groups their race and gender made invisible by the needs or problems they present This book takes the experiences of users of community care services as its starting point Drawing on feminist theory it documents the gender assumptions behind social work practice and community care policies and reveals how these impact on women and men as both providers and recipients of community care In doing so it provides an outline of the developments in practice and policy and illustrates how particular constructions of gender have influenced both This important text challenges assumptions that caring is always a positive experience for women and men To conclude a comprehensive overview of the literature about user groups is provided This informs the author's argument that practitioners in social work and social care have to be attentive in their interventions to the way that identities are constructed and experienced in order to ensure that services reflect both caring and justice
