

organisations and pressing for public intervention to support wage-working women, and thus raising consciousness. Here perhaps they underestimate the comparative success of women's independent organisation in the US and overestimate the consciousness-raising effect of the incorporated women's movements in China and Sweden.

The discussion of the influence of economic policy centres around the thesis that the increasing entry of married women into wage labour explains family policy intervention. This was clearly not true of Sweden's reforms in the 1930s which, as they show, were pro-natalist in intention and effect. It was not until the mid 1960s in Sweden (as in Britain) that married women were recognised as 'their largest untapped labor supply, more easily integrated into the labor force than immigrant workers'. Hence the second phase of Swedish family policy reforms in the 1960s coincides with the requirements of the labour market. Similarly in China 'party support for increased social services has been less a response to need than to the perceived value of maintaining and increasing the number of working women'. There have been great fluctuations in commitment to urban day care services in China for example as labour policy fluctuated under the Great Leap Forward and the Cultural Revolution. In the US the emphasis in welfare policy has been on disciplining poor families and pushing single mothers into wage work, though there is little discussion of this in the book.

'The family in political culture' is a study of the ideology of the family and the notion of family privacy as represented in marriage and child care legislation. In the US 'the family acquired its inviolability because it was the property-holding unit' whereas in Sweden marriage is viewed as a 'moral union'. The reason for this difference remains a historical mystery (to me at least). Hence in Sweden cohabitantes are much more favourably treated and single mothers are much more economically independent. The right-wing view that public services and benefits will destroy the family is very effectively demolished by the evidence from Sweden and China which shows that 'government is seeking to use public policy to bolster and preserve the family rather than replace it'. It is, of course, the 'traditional' family in which the wife is confined to domestic labour and child care which the right-wing are so anxious to preserve. The material amassed in this book, particularly on Sweden and China, provides plenty of food for thought for those who advocate progressive family policies and state services as a means of diminishing women's oppression.

These two extremely similar collections represent the clearest statement to date of what has sadly become the dominant trend amongst the British left intelligentsia. This trend is now firmly established both in the Communist Party and in the left of the Labour Party, as well as being represented in a wide variety of other political and literary tendencies. While it lacks political influence in the older organisations, it must now be reckoned to have overtaken in intellectual prestige such competing influences as British
