

SOCIOLOGY AND TEACHING: A NEW CHALLENGE FOR THE SOCIOLOGY OF EDUCATION

P. Woods and A. Pollard, eds. (Croom Helm, 1988), pp. 239, £25.00.

PAUL LITTLEWOOD

In England and Wales, where sociology has long been recognised as a legitimate course for study in schools, the 1980s have witnessed an almost explosive growth in publications on sociological research on schooling which are principally designed for teachers' consumption. This literature — by most notably Atkinson, Ball, Burgess, Delamont, Hammersley, Andy Hargreaves, Pollard and Woods — is about research for teachers and research by teachers. In Scotland, however, sociology is not taught in schools, at least overtly; a sociology degree is not a sufficient qualification for Modern Studies teacher-training; and to teach sociology in colleges of education, one does not need to be trained in sociology — while experience as a teacher has become essential. In this context, it might seem a bit pointless to suggest how relevant the discipline of sociology is or could be to the teaching profession. But to ignore this book would be to condone the broader ignorance and suspicion about the sociology of schooling that one comes across at all levels in education circles, especially today.

The collection is divided into two parts, 'Sociology and Teacher Education', and 'Sociology and Teachers: Collaboration and Research'. The first is concerned with the potential contribution sociology can make to the school teacher's work and (though to a lesser extent) the ways teachers can contribute to sociology. The second part is more directly concerned with the theme of the second SCRE forum on educational research in Scotland: how teachers and researchers (in this case sociologists) can work together to improve each other's product. This should interest all those who gained from the second forum.

The Introduction (written by Woods? — his contribution remains unclear) not surprisingly suggests that sociology has a big contribution to make to the teacher, but no longer so much in the form of more research as in helping the teacher to resolve the problems past research has identified. The 'newness' of the challenge in the book's title lies in trying to do this.

But any hope of success must be dampened by the next piece, by Wilkin, in which she describes and seeks to account for perhaps the most momentous of the changes in the training of teachers during the 1970s and 80s: the virtual disappearance in discrete form of the 'four disciplines' (including sociology), and their replacement by professional or methods courses, together with yet greater emphasis on classroom experience. I wait to be convinced by Wilkin's claim that this change might actually facilitate greater involvement between teachers and sociologists, with the latter becoming in Pollard's words, 'consultants of the classroom'; but otherwise I found the account quite compelling — if depressing.

Pollard's piece on 'reflective teaching' (that is, briefly, teaching which involves an informed awareness of self, context, aims and consequences) traces the origins of such a conception in a particular sociological tradition. Miles and Furlong assess the efficacy of the theory-oriented teaching in the Postgraduate Certificate of Education — and find that sociology is not
