INTRODUCTION

The United Nations Institute for Training and Research (UNITAR) have conceived, as one of their projects, a series of national studies concerned with estimating the effectiveness of measures against racial discrimination. The first such study has been carried out in Britain<sup>1</sup> by the Institute of Race Relations working in co-operation with UNITAR. The ultimate intention of the national studies is that there should be a comparison of anti-discriminatory measures and resulting recommendations on improving the effectiveness of such measures.

For the British project, a number of papers re-assessing the existing data were prepared.<sup>2</sup> These covered the absorption of immigrants and minority groups into British society, demographic and statistical background, employment, housing, education, anti-discriminatory legislation, other government measures, and the police. Papers were also prepared on the Race Relations Board, and on the Community Relations Commission and the local committees, and here work included some interviewing.<sup>3</sup> A further range of interviews was carried out with immigrant leaders.<sup>4</sup> Finally, Social and Community Planning Research were commissioned to carry out a survey of white-collar job applicants and discrimination: the subsequent paper is their research report and is printed here in its original form.

Why was it decided to collect data on job applications and discrimination within the present study? The answer to this lies in the way in which the concept of discrimination was treated, and in the relative paucity of evidence on this particular area of discrimination. It was recognized<sup>5</sup> that discrimination was not simply an act, or series of acts, but rather a process involving such factors as in-group,
