ABSTRACT

The macroprudential policy of central banks plays a key role in ensuring financial stability not only at the level of individual states but also on the scale of the entire global economy. In this regard, adequate measurement of its effectiveness is an urgent task for national and supranational financial regulatory authorities. The present study is focused on solving this problem. The purpose of the study is to develop indicators and criteria for a comprehensive assessment of the effectiveness of countries' macroprudential policies, allowing for a cross-country analysis of this effectiveness and identifying the best global practices in macroprudential regulation. The study is based on the consolidation of the market and institutional approaches to measuring financial stability, as well as on the use of normative methods and methods of comparative economic analysis. As a result of the study, new indicators for diagnosing the effectiveness of macroprudential policy have been developed. Criteria are proposed to determine the international positions of countries in terms of the level of general, market, and institutional effectiveness of the macroprudential policy. Testing of the developed indicators and criteria was carried out for 180 countries for the period 1998–2019. The developed indicators and criteria for the effectiveness of macroprudential policy differ from the existing ones in a comprehensive manner, since they take into account the stability of financial markets and financial systems at the same time. They are also more representative as they include a wider range of parameters taken into account in financial stability calculations.

INTRODUCTION

Based on a knowledge-intensive review of the literature [1], in recent years there has been an increase in scientific interest in the problems of the effectiveness of macroprudential policies of central banks. This is due to the fact that a high-quality macroprudential policy can ensure financial stability and thus create conditions for economic growth [2]. However, as noted in some publications [3–4], public understanding of the essence and effectiveness of the macroprudential policy is still limited. In particular, scientific studies of macroprudential policy and practice of regulating financial stability do not provide exhaustive answers regarding its goals, regimes, transmission mechanism, and rules for making decisions by state authorities, and evaluating the effectiveness of these decisions. The unresolved problems are largely due to the versatility of the macroprudential policy and the duality of its goal: ensuring the stability of financial markets and financial systems [4].

In scientific research, a fragmented approach to assessing the effectiveness of macroprudential policies prevails. The fragmentation of ongoing research hinders the development of a methodology for effective state regulation of financial stability. International standards for the formation and application of financial regulation instruments are advisory in nature and allow for their adjustment at the level of national jurisdictions. The desire to eliminate the problem of fragmentation in assessing the effectiveness of macroprudential policies encouraged this study.
