

Modern History &amp; Politics: North Africa

The Islamic Movement in North Africa, by FRANÇOIS BURGAT & WILLIAM DOWELL. Foreword by Robert Fernea. (Middle East Monograph Series) 310 pages, tables, notes. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1993. $13.95 (Paper) ISBN 0-292-70793-2

This work is a revised and translated version of Burgat's L'islamisme au Maghreb (1988), which was based primarily on interviews Burgat conducted in the Maghreb from 1984 to 1988. This revised version in English includes new material Burgat gathered from 1989 through 1992. It is unquestionably a very useful work and indispensable reading for anyone interested in the fundamentalist movements of Islamic North Africa.

The authors, like many Western scholars who study the Islamic world, disapprove of the term "fundamentalist" for the usual reasons—its Western origin and its connotations of bigotry and fanaticism. They neglect to mention, however, that in Morocco at any rate, the Arabic translation of "fundamentalist" (usuli) is routinely used by those educated Moroccans who refuse to use the term "Islamist" (Islami) on the grounds that it implies that the people so labeled are the true representatives of Islam and all other Muslims are misguided.

The authors note that "Islamic discourse gives coherence to the expression of frustrations of all types" (p. 77). They correctly stress that the fundamentalist movements appealed primarily to students and university graduates up through the mid-1980s (pp. 91, 97, 99), but Algeria's Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) was able to transcend this base by the late 1980s and early 1990s (pp. 99-100).

Like many Western scholars, Burgat and Dowell go to great lengths to overcome the Western image of Islamic fundamentalists as fanatical extremists. They are, of course, quite right to stress that there are moderate fundamentalists who reject the use of violence. They are also right to argue that the repressive violence of states has often greatly exceeded the violence perpetrated by the fundamentalists. But to view fundamentalist violence as simply a response to state violence is simplistic (see pp. 115-116). It is difficult to see how the death sentences Muslim fundamentalists have imposed on intellectuals like Salman Rushdie, Farag Foda and Tahar Djaout were simply responses to state violence. What about the fundamentalist attempt to force an Egyptian court to divorce Professor Nasr Hamid Abu Zayd and his wife on the grounds that he is an infidel because of the content of his scholarly writings and therefore unfit to be married to a Muslim woman? Is this simply a response to state violence?

There is a disturbing paternalism in the attitude of scholars like Burgat vis-à-vis Muslim fundamentalists. They would be outraged if a Jerry Falwell or a Moshe Levinger were to try to kill (or terminate the marriages of) secular intellectuals for words they had written. Yet when Muslim fundamentalists do the same thing, some Western scholars feel compelled to rush to their defense and ignore those Muslims who are horrified by what is being done by those who claim to represent Islam.
