of mixed Norman and Welsh descent he is also known as Gerald de Barri. Gerald became a royal clerk and chaplain to King Henry II of England in 1184, first acting as mediator between the crown and Prince Rhys ap Irfudd. He was chosen to accompany one of the king's sons, John, in 1185 on John's first expedition to Ireland. This was the catalyst for his literary career; his work Topographia Hibernica first published in 1188 and revised at least four more times, is an account of his journey to Ireland. Gerald always referred to it as his Topography, though History is the more accurate term. He followed it up shortly afterwards with an account of Henry's conquest of Ireland, the Expugnatio Hibernica. Both works were revised and added to several times before his death and display a notable degree of Latin learning as well as a great deal of prejudice against a foreign people. Gerald was proud to be related to some of the Norman invaders of Ireland, such as his maternal uncle Robert Fitz Stephen and Raymond Fitz Gerald, and his influential account which portrays the Irish as barbaric savages gives important insight into Anglo-Norman views of Ireland and the history of the invasion.
