

mov was concerned, Azef remained a loyal police agent throughout his career. Even though Boris Nikolaevskii mined much of this information for his classic study of Azef, Gerasimov's book still contains some useful bits of untapped information.

Gerasimov's remembrances contain dissembling of the sort that is found in most memoir literature and, as a result, the facts must be gleaned with care. Nevertheless, this book should be read by historians interested in the reign of Nicholas II and in particular by those scholars who are concerned with the evolution of political police institutions in Russia and in the Soviet Union.

STOLYPIN: RUSSIA'S LAST GREAT REFORMER. By Alexander V. Zenkovsky. Translated by Margaret Puloski. Preface by Philip E. Mosely and Maria Stolypina Bock. Postword by Serge A. Zenkovsky. Princeton, N.J.: Kingston Press, 1986. x, 144 pp. Cloth.

Alexander Zenkovsky (1878–1966) first published his memoir of the Stolypin years in 1956 under the title Pravda o Stolypine. This title was more appropriate than that chosen by the editors. Like many memoirists of this rich late imperial genre, Zenkovsky composed not a history of the era or a biography of Stolypin, but his perceptions of the "truth" concerning Petr Arkad'evich Stolypin. Advancing a straightforward, yet often disputed, thesis, Zenkovsky argued that Stolypin "was not only a remarkable statesman but a great Russian patriot whose principal aim was the welfare of the Russian people and the prevention of possible cataclysm for Russia" (p. 119).

Specialists of late imperial political and social history should greet the appearance of these reminiscences, now accessible to a broader audience of students, but also should be wary of using the work as a secondary source. Zenkovsky, a graduate of St. Vladimir (Kiev) University and from 1903 a financial specialist employed by the Kiev provincial board for zemstvo affairs, first came to Stolypin's attention in 1906 as an expert knowledgeable in zemstvo budgetary matters. The minister subsequently asked him to study various aspects of zemstvo life, thus establishing a relationship that yielded the central documents of this book.

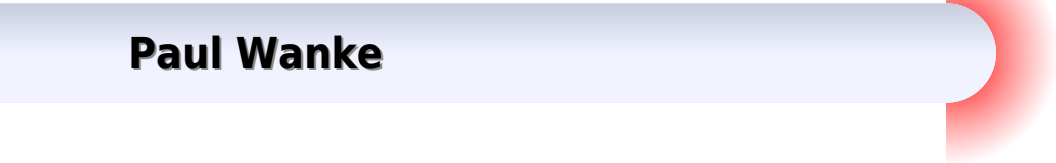

According to Zenkovsky, soon after the Western Zemstvo crisis, in May 1911, Stolypin dictated to him "a report to the Sovereign about enacting reforms and renovating the state administration of Russia" (p. 28). No copies of this document are extant, although its contents generally accord with other reform projects then present within the imperial bureaucracy.

The plan had three goals. First, it aimed to expand the jurisdiction and responsibilities of local zemstvo and urban self-administration. Such administrative decentralization required the creation of a new ministry of local self-administration, a means to incorporate these local organs, and their politically important constituencies, more fully into the bureaucratic government. Second, the plan proposed a functional reorganization and expansion of the ministerial system (labor, nationalities, social security, religious creeds, natural resources, public health), presaging a trend apparent under the Provisional and Soviet governments. Third, it emphasized the further specialization and professionalization of the imperial bureaucracy: new ministries, increased salaries, new higher educational institutions and requirements, and, most significant, the effective removal of the sovereign's personal right to appoint ministers.

Zenkovsky's claim that Stolypin intended to force this plan upon his disenchanted patron Nicholas II, possibly even securing the legislation by dissolving the Third Duma and using Article 87, is a dubious, although intriguing, contention. In general, the more
