

Differences between Proofreading and Editing

Editing

- Editing occurs earlier in the writing process before proofreading.
- Editing involves analyzing and reorganizing conceptual chunks to clarify, strengthen and condense the message. It looks at the "big picture".
- Editing allows for major revisions, reworking parts, altering content and syntax to improve clarity and flow.
- Editors analyze voice, language, plot, argument and maintain consistency in grammar and tone.
- Editing requires higher-level skills in clarifying thought, consolidating reader needs, consistency, word choice etc.
- The goal of editing is to form a coherent, effectively expressed whole message. (Auer)

Proofreading

- Proofreading is the final stage after editing to catch any remaining errors.
- Proofreading requires viewing the text at a micro level, separating language components from meaning to catch errors precisely.
- Editing allows for major revisions, reworking parts, altering content and syntax to improve clarity and flow.
- Proofreaders focus on catching mechanical errors in spelling, punctuation, capitalization, typos and adherence to style guides.
- Proofreading skills are centered on a keen eye for detail and in-depth knowledge of language mechanics.
- Proofreading aims to harness the copy into a polished, error-free perfection. (Auer)
