A Review by
Stephen Kline
Environmental Science, York University

In the past, the academic study of communications has suffered the accusation of bearing a similar relationship to practice in the media, as jurisprudence bears to law; in both fields theoretical or analytic refinements have been of little real interest to practitioners. However, as the scientism of the sixties waned, so too did the cultish quest for fundamental underlying principles of communication. The seventies have witnessed the emergence of a new strain of communication research which construes communications as a fundamental social process and not as an epiphenomenon of culture. The momentum of this new approach resulted in a shift in the aspirations of the communication researcher from empiricist explanation to 'critical' analysis. The metier was meant to be issues and policy; success was to be gauged by reactions and changes provoked from within the media themselves. In the debate which ensued, the effects of the media, their history, and even falsified assumptions about media processes were marshalled into new arguments designed to threaten the media with legislation, or at least further commissions of enquiry.

The media thus found themselves vulnerable to a contradiction of their own making. The myth of pluralism demanded the illusion of diversity of voice and interest within the ideological market of North American media, a demand which contradicts the centralist corporate nature and mass marketing biases of their economic structure. This commitment to the invisible hand of the public interest which is meant to be served by the media in their drive for private profit, has in fact provided enough leverage to establish a seemingly endless series of commissions, hearings, new legislation and restructured regulatory bodies - all much to the benefit and pride of the academicians. Yet for all this effort and in spite of cable, satellite and other new technologies, media practices remain by and large unchanged. The unsubtle blend of violence and trivia still pours forth from the box, and each evening ritualistically closes with the newsman's carefully articulated assurances that the system survives (more or less the same) for another day.
