The Military Franchise:

Factors of Franchise Success for Veterans who Leave the Military and Lead Their Own Franchise Mitchell E. Brew, 2022 The current cohort of U S military veterans are unique many of whom during the last 20 years of conflict have volunteered for multiple deployments They are also more educated and technologically savvy than past generations of veterans When they leave military service some veterans who seek a second career choose to own their own business with the help of a franchise organization The purpose of this mixed methods study was to understand the factors and characteristics related to the success of military veterans who elected to pursue a vocation as a franchise owner A research methodology was developed through the lens of military transition career choice entrepreneurial and franchise theory An online survey was answered by 21 veteran and 87 nonveteran franchisees In addition five focused semistructured interviews with veteran franchise owner were conducted A deductive thematic analysis of the interviews identified a deeper understanding of the military experience and franchise ownership satisfaction as well as recommendations for other transitioning veterans The findings indicated that compared to nonveterans veteran franchise owners reported being more creative more self confident having more openness to experience and higher level of agreeableness The implications of the findings are for veteran self awareness for their predictable fit with owning a franchised business and in order have a better chance for being successful Additionally these findings may aid franchisors in selecting veteran franchisees with a greater chance of success and to assist service and policy organizations to better understand what is needed to support those in military transition The results suggested that further studies are needed to establish greater causal relationships based on age gender race military experience franchise industry global presence and to confirm these research findings
