

There are several reasons why an experimentalist is likely to have a different view of the world than a theorist. First, the experimentalist is likely to be more concerned with the practical aspects of the world, such as the design of experiments and the interpretation of data. Second, the experimentalist is likely to be more concerned with the limitations of the experimental method, such as the possibility of systematic errors and the need for replication. Third, the experimentalist is likely to be more concerned with the specific details of the world, such as the properties of the materials used in the experiment and the behavior of the subjects. Finally, the experimentalist is likely to be more concerned with the process of discovery, such as the formulation of hypotheses and the testing of predictions.
