The conventional wisdom is that a US-Soviet arms control agreement with the president's signature on such a document before year's end might be possible. But before exploring the possibilities, it is worth noting that the Soviet Union has a very serious stockpile of nuclear weapons, which could be used to threaten the United States. The announcement of a Geneva 10-day agreement...

In some ways, a total ban on types of missiles is easier to agree upon than a ban on all nuclear weapons. The limit is 100, it's a lot better for sure than the doesn't have...

For this reason, many officials are willing to drop more stringent verification if they had previously demanded it to accept in a treaty.

However, other officials are willing, and the administration developed a unified negotiating position. The key concern was whether a treaty should be signed if the other's position is not satisfactory, to ensure that the treaty is not a one-sided agreement.
