INTRODUCTION: A NEW ERA FOR SPATIAL ARCHAEOLOGY WITH THE VTOL ADVENT AND THE NEED FOR LIDAR GUIDELINES

The paper is a research compendium on how Spatial Archaeology can benefit from LiDAR technology. Specifically, we refer to VTOL fixed-wing UAV LiDAR applied in Mesoamerica. In many European countries and the USA, the cartographic database of the entire national territory (Harding et al., 2008; Stoker et al., 2014) has been available on the Internet for many years, albeit at medium resolution. In Mesoamerica, from Chase's studies and surveys from the 2000s to the present, (Chase et al., 2014, 2020; Ebert, 2016a, 2016b; Caracol Archaeological Project, 2020, June 12) a long tradition of LiDAR investigation has yielded unexpected, incredible knowledge about the ancient Maya civilization. Although LiDAR has exploded in popularity, there is still a lack of systematic overview of how it has contributed to archaeological theory, especially at the landscape scale of spatial archaeology and from the perspective of digital application. Today, researchers acknowledge the need for specific LiDAR guidelines (European Archaeological Council: EAC, Eac site, (n.d.)), which are still expected, while other geospatial techniques guidelines are already available, such as magnetometers or ground-penetrating radar (Schmidt et al., 2015). However, universities, departments, and international bodies are on the way and understand the importance of having common classification standards (Garstka, 2020) and metadata and paradata (Wise & Miller, 1997) to be shared in a network for digital archaeology and also on a global scale. Therefore, case studies and best practices are useful to demonstrate the magical utility of this technology that opens the field to multidisciplinary and a new era of archaeological research (Barceló, 2016, 2017).

BACKGROUND: LIDAR UTILIZATION

In many countries, LiDAR data topography is already available on the web (Kissling et al., 2022; Organismo Autónomo Centro Nacional de Información Geográfica, n.d.); in others, it is available on request, so that a significant part of the world is openly accessible. The main reason for this choice by governments is the
