

discounting factor tells us little, if anything at all, about how individuals think about intertemporal choices. Time-inconsistent models of intertemporal choice theory have been developed to more accurately reflect human rationale and time preferences. Such models show that individuals have a strongly biased preference for present consumption, and that they more closely use hyperbolic discounting to make choices involving future outcomes. Hyperbolic discounting implies that individuals have a strong time preference for the present, and that subsequent near future periods are much more heavily discounted than periods further in the future. This means that if individuals make choices that involve delayed outcomes, valuations of those outcomes will decrease more rapidly in periods closer to the choice, and the rate of decrease will diminish as time moves further out. Time-inconsistent models suggest that we do not have the cognitive resources to understand what our preferences will be as we look further out into the future. These models are consistent with, and help explain the presence preference reversals that commonly occur when we make intertemporal choices. In terms of marriage, time-inconsistent models provide descriptive insight into how present-bias might lead individuals to impulsively engage into a marital arrangement, and explain how and why the value of a marriage to an individual might change over time. Time-inconsistent models may additionally have normative implications: if individuals can better understand how they make choices, and better understand the uncertainties they face, they might be subject to less error in their judgments. In the case of marriage, understanding intertemporal choice might influence individuals take more of a long-term view in assessing the decision to get married. Married couples might even elect to implement self-control and commitment devices to mitigate future preference reversals in order to maintain a healthier longer-term relationship.

USING GAME THEORY TO SUSTAIN COMPATIBILITY IN MARRIAGE

If the marriage market operated perfectly, the optimal sorting of individuals in the market would take place. As mentioned earlier, the underlying assumptions for a truly efficient market presumes that individuals have time-consistent rank ordered preferences, and optimize their outcomes through the use of perfect information. Optimal sorting would mean that individuals would select partners whose characteristics exactly meet their pre-defined preferences. If this occurred, marriage outcomes would be maximized and individuals would be perfectly compatible. Under the assumption that individuals in a marriage would be perfectly compatible, one could further infer that this means that they would not substitute out any of their partner's characteristics, given the opportunity. Further, if that assumption held, it is likely that married couples would have no propensity to ever disagree. However, we know that this is certainly not the case in the real world. The cognitive limitations, simplifying heuristics, systematic biases, and models of observable human decision mechanisms discussed earlier reveal the inability of individuals to optimize, especially in intertemporal choice decisions such as marriage. Therefore, when individuals enter into a marital arrangement, they must strive to achieve compatibility. This however, is difficult given that married individuals almost inevitably have different ways of viewing the world, and thus making decisions. It is difficult enough for an individual achieve desirable outcomes when facing complex choices, and thus even more complicated when two individuals attempt to optimize their joint outcomes. Behavioral Game Theory examines how two or more individuals will each attempt to achieve the best outcomes, but are subject
