

While nude women are a staple of commercial and art photography, the photographed male nude is often the target of censorship but seldom the subject of serious critical discussion. This is the first study to examine the unique interrelation between social perceptions of the nude and the medium of photography. Melody Davis focuses on the work of six artists—Robert Mapplethorpe, Lucas Samaras, John Coplans, George Dumau, Joel Peter Witton, and Dušan Makavejev—whose photography confronts societal prohibitions. To understand the taboo and silence that surround this subject, she addresses the many social and cultural fears that inhibit the presentation and discussion of photographed male nudity.

"An important contribution to a little understood subject, particularly admirable for the sensible and level-headed way in which it deals with the strong taboos which still surround the material. I think it will become an essential book in photographic studies, since the male nude plays an ever-increasing role in contemporary subject matter."

Edward Lucie-Smith

"Davis makes an important contribution to the new and growing literature on the sexual representation of the male body. This book is a must for anyone interested in gender studies in photography, film, or art history."

Peter Lehman, author of Running Scared: Masculinity and the Representation of the Male Body

Melody B. Davis is an independent writer and photographer who has taught in the fine arts departments of Montclair State College and State University of New York at Stony Brook. Her poetry and art criticism have been published in numerous journals and her photographs are in the permanent collections of the Brooklyn Museum, the Canadian Centre for Architecture (Montreal), the New York Historical Society, and the Museum of the City of New York. She is president of Psalms, a nonprofit corporation that brings literary events to Brooklyn.
