Solar Coronal Structure Study National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA), 2018-06-15 The subject of this investigation is to study the physics of the solar corona through the analysis of the EUV and UV data produced by two flights 12 May 1992 and 25 April 1994 of the Lockheed Solar Plasma Diagnostics Experiment SPDE sounding rocket payload in combination with Yohkoh and ground based data Each rocket flight produced both spectral and imaging data These joint datasets are useful for understanding the physical state of various features in the solar atmosphere at different heights ranging from the photosphere to the corona at the time of the rocket flights which took place during the declining phase of a solar cycle 24 years before the minimum The investigation is narrowly focused on comparing the physics of small and medium scale strong field structures with that of large scale weak fields As we close this investigation we have to recall that our present position in the understanding of basic solar physics problems such as coronal heating is much different from that in 1995 when we proposed this investigation due largely to the great success of SOHO and TRACE In other words several topics and techniques we proposed can now be better realized with data from these missions For this reason at some point of our work we started concentrating on the 1992 data which are more unique and have more supporting data As a result we discontinued the investigation on small scale structures i.e. bright points since high resolution TRACE images have addressed more important physics than SPDE EUV images could do In the final year we still spent long time calibrating the 1992 data The work was complicated because of the old fashioned film which had problems not encountered with more modern CCD detectors After our considerable effort on calibration we were able to focus on several scientific topics relying heavily on the SPDE UV images They include the relation between filaments and filament channels the identification of hot loop
