

trained in the MTADDP yet they are the target beneficiary.

On the basis of the findings from this study and from review of literature, it is recommended for consistency and continuation in the implementation of government policies employing holistic approaches in the handling of public projects. Four special initiatives by the government were good. The establishment of Agricultural Mechanization Service Centers (AMSCs), National Fertilizer Subsidy Programme, Establishment of Block Farms concept and the National Food Buffer Stock Company (NAFSCO). These initiatives should be strengthened to significantly address farmers' problems in the country. Marginalized farmer groups should be given special consideration in the implementation of existing agricultural policies and in any new ones.

This is essential given their circumstances and central role they play in agriculture in Ghana. Achieving this may call for refining the FASDEP II objectives to realistically reflect the true needs of small farmers and take pragmatic measures to ensure the achievement of such objectives. The issue of subsidies should be revisited. It will help for the authorities and development partners to see spending in the agriculture subsidies as investment expenditure against the mindset that subsidy is bad. Removing subsidies slowly kills initiative leaves no room for our resource poor farmers to innovate. Ghana can only make a progress in food security when our governments begin to provide subsidy to place our farmers on a level playing grounds to be able to compete well with farmers anywhere in the world.
