

after intense (and often inactive) academic classroom activities, children need to “let off steam.” To some extent, educators also believe that outdoor play enables children to “recharge their batteries,” to reinvigorate themselves by engaging in a very different activity from their classroom experience. This recreation theory of play enables children to get ready to return to the important work of academic learning. These theories view outdoor play as an essential component to academic learning, not as an important activity in its own right.

Health

Everyone who works with young children will know how quickly bacteria and viruses spread in these environments. One way to reduce the spread of infection is through lots and lots of fresh air. Outdoor play enables the infectious agents to spread out and be dissipated; it also enables children to get fresh air and exercise and be less constrained than they are in the classroom.

Outdoor play also enables children to enjoy the natural environment and learn to seek out exercise, fresh air, and activity. There is something fundamentally healthy about using the outdoors. Thus outdoor play develops disposition for the outdoors, for physical activity, and for care of the environment. Children who engage in lots of physical activities tend to engage in more energetic activities at home, while children that lack active physical activity engage in more sedentary behaviors at home, such as watching TV and computer use. Children who learn to enjoy the outdoors have a much higher likelihood of becoming adults who enjoy hiking, gardening, hiking, bicycling, mountain climbing, or other outdoor endeavors. This is critical as obesity becomes an ever-greater national concern and as we must all learn to care for and protect the environment.

Allowing Children to Be Children

Using open space to fulfill basic childhood needs, jumping, running, climbing, swinging, racing, yelling, rolling, hiding, hiding, and making a big mess is what childhood is all about! For a variety of obvious reasons many of these things cannot occur indoors. Yet children must have these important experiences. Today children's lives are more and more contained and controlled by small apartments, high-stakes academic instruction, schedules, tense, tired, and overworked parents, and by fewer opportunities to be children. Outdoor environments fulfill children's basic needs for freedom, adventure, experimentation, risk-taking, and just being children.

Children need the opportunity to explore the unknown, the unpredictable, and the adventurous. They also need to be able to wonder around nature.
