

The Florentine paintings in Holland

1300-1500

Edited by H. W. van Os & Marian Prakken of the University of Groningen

All the early Florentine paintings in the public and private collections of the Netherlands

Among the belongings of the stadholder-king William III when he died in England in 1702 was a pair of the greatest Florentine portraits of the Renaissance. Although he had taken them over from James II, his successor Queen Anne had them sent to William's native country. In this way Holland acquired its first two Florentine paintings - Piero di Cosimo's portraits of Giuliano da Sangallo and his father (see cat. nos 38-39). Today they are hanging in the Rijksmuseum.

So little was known about Italian art in Holland, however, that the portraits were long thought to have been painted by Lucas van Leyden or Albert Dürer. Only towards the end of the 19th century did an Italian scholar identify them correctly.

It was not until our century that Dutch art historians began to devote serious attention to the Italian paintings in their own country. In the present publication their study of the early Florentines in Holland has come to fruition.

The museums and art collectors of the Netherlands have not been inactive either. Since 1702 more than 60 early Florentine paintings - including masterpieces by Fra Angelico, Lorenzo Monaco and Filippino Lippi - have found their way to Dutch collections. In this book they are all described, analysed and illustrated for the first time. The discussions, based on technical as well as art-historical investigation, are thorough and down to earth.
