In this review article, Jane Thomas outlines the different reasons and arguments behind two different views of industrialization in women. She first outlines the women's rights movement and its role in the nineteenth century in the establishment of women's regulations. Both being well known women's rights during nineteenth century. She then outlines different authors that present different views, some say that women have been completely oppressed by industrialization, and others believe women in the home. While others say that women benefited from this in the long term. Thomas concludes by stating that it is impossible for us to truly know whether regulations had a positive or negative effect on women, due to the lack of proper records created and maintained. However she states that with available evidence, it is more likely women in that differing phases of industrial and compare them to the present. While women that
