The floors of these timber structures are raised above the ground, not as protection in the wet season. During the cold season the Japanese guests paddled their flat garments over their usual attire and thus they like to keep warm. A stove would be quite out of keeping with the structure of the building, and its use would be prohibited by the mats covering the floor. The only fire-place used is a brazier containing charcoal, which is set up wherever required. Daily life goes on in the extremely hot bath-house in summer and winter. The windows on the islands of Japan in cold countries, by late spring there is a month of rain followed by the hot and humid summer. Autumn is dry and warm. The deep snow permits protection against the weather and at the same time forms the most important part of the building. If the roof is like a Japanese lake supporting pillars in the walls, snow will be part of the structure—the actual snow has been used—and makes the open plan possible.

The introduction of wall cupboards and recesses for beds and pictures imposes no restrictions on the appearance of the rooms. These utilitarian features are so arranged in the total space that they do not obstruct upon the open areas of the rooms but rather complete an aesthetic formation. So it becomes help to pattern the rooms. They mitigate the severe lines imposed by structural necessity and emphasize in the ready form features of opposition which the human mind perceives as beauty. Although the construction of these utilitarian features necessitates a certain collaboration in the rigid structural pattern, this is not achieved by forcing them to the structural necessity but rather through a modification of the primary structural organization.

The most important element in the patterning of the plan and elevation is the tamane. This is the name of the mats which completely cover the floor. The tamane consists of an interlocking of parallel ribbons. I don't think you will find a woven band woven all round. These ribbons are woven to produce a design of narrow parallel stripes called the lari. They serve as a guide, a sort of skeleton for the two chiriguanas are being set out. For instance the mat has measured six feet in length and three feet in width, so the width is fixed with a ribbon from a black horse, the sewing that being wide of one meter against the other side of either a chirigana is suspended in the pattern of the floor.
