

BRAIN STRUCTURES

The brain is a complex and highly layered structure. Peeling back the (imaginary) cerebral membranes reveals a further set of structures within (and) and between lobes, such as the cerebellum and brainstem, which others are (zones of) neural fibres (or nerve cells) within larger structures, observable only by microscope (examination).

THE BRAIN HIERARCHY

The brain's major parts can be divided or categorised in several ways. In all of these systems, the dominant part is the cerebrum, the large grey-pink, wrinkled structure that takes more than three-quarters of the brain's total volume. The cerebrum is divided into left and right hemispheres, which are linked by a "bridge" of nerve fibres, the corpus callosum. The cerebellum, which includes the hippocampus and amygdala, is also known as the diencephalon. Together with the pons, it makes up the brainstem. The brainstem, hippocampus, and associated parts collectively form the diencephalon. It comprises the major brain "control" centres, or the brainstem (hypothalamus). Below the cerebrum is the medulla oblongata, a small structure that contains groups of nerve cell bodies known as nuclei, such as the basal ganglia. Below the medulla is the brainstem (myelencephalon), with the pons, as its appearance part, and brainstem to the cerebellum and the medulla, which opens in a way with the spinal cord.
