This article attempts to rethink the early church praxis of selling the land and possessions in response to some of the problems the 1st century church were confronted with. Hence, this article attempts to answer the questions: what were the social, economic, and religious factors that led to the selling of land and possessions in the early church, and what were the implications of this practice for the community, including issues related to exploitation, inequality, and long-term sustainability of resources? This article argues that the church in South Africa must lead the conversation and learn from the early church good example to respond to social ills of our time. This is without undermining the complexities that are part of this programme of action. This article is committed to socio-historical reading of the texts under inquiry as the means to respond to the questions raised in this study.

Contribution: This article seeks to contribute to the ongoing debate on issues of land, possessions, and poverty in a South African context. It attempts to explore possible implications on issues that concern this article for churches in South Africa.

Keywords: land; possessions; early church; rich; poor; poverty; inequality; Luke-Acts; socio-historical; socio-economic; Graeco-Roman world; South African Church.

Introduction

The early church is famously known to be the vibrant early Christian movement in so much that it became distinct to other religious institutions of her age. One of the distinctive elements that led to this uniqueness was the communal life she experienced. While there are some similarities between the activities of the early Christians described in Acts and the ideas in Plato's Critias (concerning community property) and Ovid's Metamorphoses, the early Christian movement had its own unique traits. Early Christian activities were distinguished by their focus on worship, teaching, healing, and evangelism as well as by their emphasis on group cooperation and support for the common good. The communal character of Acts did not result in the abolishment of private property, but rather in a voluntary sharing among neighbours who were driven by love and concern for one another (Johnson 1992:62–63).

Keener (2012) points out that:

[A]lthough Plato's ideal community did not require all members to share everything in common, its guardians did (Plato, Rep. 6.499CD). While others viewed Plato's as someone who approved a state with minimal selfishness (where ‘mine’ and ‘not mine’ were mentioned infrequently), where people would treat truly significant things as held in common. (pp. 1015–1016)

This communal life was orchestrated by means of the shared life, through selling of land and possessions to meet the needs of the needy from within the church. This practice no doubt was such an amazing act that it contributed greatly to the spreading of the Gospel (Johnson 1992:58–59; Keener 2013:1177–1179; Wall 2002:504–505). It remained as an act of selflessness and generosity, as believers shared their resources with one another and helped to support the community as a whole (Cook 2022:269–286). However, on the other hand, it had the potential of being problematic from several perspectives.

The socio-cultural, economic and political context of Luke-Acts

The focus of this section is limited only to the relations between the rich and the poor in the 1st-century Graeco-Roman world(s). Followed by a brief socio-historical context of Acts and with

Sociohistorical Study In Address:

Historical Pragmatics Andreas H. Jucker, 1995-01-01 Until very recently pragmatics has been restricted to the analysis of contemporary spoken language while historical linguistics has studied historical texts and language change in a decontextualized way This has now radically changed and scholars from around the world are trying to build a new theoretical framework that integrates recent advances both in pragmatics and in historical linguistics The volume which contains 22 original articles starts with an introduction that is both a state of the art account of historical pragmatics and a programmatic statement of its future potential and its different subfields Part I contains seven pragmaphilological papers that deal with historical texts and their interpretations by paying close attention to the communicative context of these texts The second and third parts comprise papers in diachronic pragmatics The ten papers of part II take a linguistic form as their starting point e g particular lexical items or syntactic constructions and study their pragmatic functions at different times diachronic form to function mappings while the four papers of part III take a particular pragmatic function as their starting point e g discourse strategies or politeness and study their linguistic realisation at different times diachronic function to form mappings
