

The Development of Past Tense Verbal Morphology in Classroom L2 Spanish

M. RAFAEL SALABERRY

Penn State University

Previous research (e.g. Andersen 1986, 1991; Bardovi-Harlig and Bergström 1996; Robison 1990, 1995) has shown that the development of aspectual distinctions (inflectional morphology) among adult second language learners is associated with lexical aspect. The present study analyzed the development of Past tense verbal morphology in L2 Spanish among 20 college-level L1 English students. Four native speakers acted as a control group. The study was based on the analysis of oral movie narratives collected at two different times two months apart. The results of the study show that the lexical aspectual semantics of the verb phrase have an increasing influence on the selection of verbal endings throughout development of the L2. In contrast, for the lowest-level learners represented in this study the effect of lexical aspect is minimal compared to the effect of tense contrasts.

INTRODUCTION

The analysis of the development of Past tense verbal morphology among natural learners (e.g. Dietrich, Klein and Noyau 1995; Klein and Perdue 1992; Meisel 1987; Robison 1990; Sato 1990; Schumann 1987; Trévisé 1987) and tutored adult learners (e.g. Bardovi-Harlig 1992, 1995; Bergström 1995; Harley 1989; Hasbún 1995; Kaplan 1987; Lafford 1996; Liskin-Gasparro 1997; Ramsay 1990; Robison 1995; Salaberry 1998a) has generated an intense debate on the acquisition of tense-aspect contrasts. Most studies on natural learners show little early use of verbal morphology and arguments have been made for the use of tense distinctions before aspectual marking. On the other hand, most studies on classroom-tutored learners show early development of verbal morphology and an apparent effect of lexical aspectual values on the selection of verbal morphology.

In this study I will analyze the acquisition of the Preterite–Imperfect distinction in L2 Spanish among classroom learners (L1 English speakers) based on the oral retellings of a silent movie. The purpose of the study is to investigate the potential role of lexical semantics in the selection of verbal morphology among instructed second language learners of different levels of proficiency in the target language.

Comrie (1976: 3) defines aspect as the ‘way of viewing the internal temporal constituency of a situation’ (beginning, middle and end). Aspectual
