

SUPPORTING LITERACY DEVELOPMENT IN AAC USERS

The ability to develop and access literacy skills is known to improve access to education materials, financial understanding, increase job opportunities, and foster independence in individuals with disabilities. Literacy skills for individuals who utilize augmentative and alternative communication (AAC) are extremely important, as these skills promote authentic self-expression outside of pre-programmed messages, provide a means of educational accessibility and learning, enhance vocational opportunities, and improve advocacy. Unfortunately, children who require AAC are at risk for delayed semantic, syntactic, and morphological development due to altered communicative experiences and limited experiences with various forms of language.¹ Additionally, children utilizing AAC and who may be non-speaking are at significant risk of delayed phonological awareness skills and altered speech sound understanding. Compounding factors that may impact an AAC user's literacy learning may include intrinsic factors such as visual, hearing, motor, cognitive, and/or speech/language impairments and extrinsic factors such as physical contexts such as home and school environment, social contexts, and language contexts.¹ Despite this, the acquisition of literacy skills in children utilizing AAC is crucial for long-term communicative success, independence, and quality of life.

Five principles to guide literacy instruction for students with intellectual and developmental disabilities¹

1. All people are capable of learning literacy skills.
2. Literacy is a human right and is also an important part of how people experience the world and experience quality of life.
3. Literacy involves communication and connections with others, rather than being solely an individual experience.
4. Literacy encompasses all forms of communication.
5. Children's literacy development should be a team effort and the responsibility of any single individual.

Some specific strategies to utilize during early literacy opportunities for children who utilize AAC include:

- Use modeling or aided language stimulation during activities as these strategies can be effective in introducing new vocabulary.
- Use supplemental communication boards with targeted vocabulary specific to the book. You can also program the child's personal device with vocabulary specific to reading. Consider using symbols within applications as these provide great opportunities for receptive learning during discussion opportunities.
- Introduce opportunities for initiation during structured settings to increase participation and overall learning. Notice that how often the child is requested and how often he is requested to respond during structured settings will increase literacy skills, speech, and overall literacy skills.
- Use a variety of communication methods to support literacy development.

- Model the use of symbols throughout the reading experience without necessarily using the child's device.
