

The Library's Catalog: From Cards to Databases

First, Some Definitions

call number: A call number is an arrangement of letters and numbers assigned to an item located in a library's collection in order to provide a library user with an easy way to locate the item on the shelf. Most library systems assign call numbers based on the subject matter covered in the item. A Library of Congress call number will look like this: PT2635.E68H625 1983. A Dewey Decimal call number will look like this: 833.912 REMARQUE.

card catalog: An organized index to library materials consisting of cabinets filled with cards that describe and locate materials in the library. A typical card catalog would list items by author, title, and subject or might combine all three into one alphabetically arranged system.

database: A computerized system for indexing and retrieving information. A database might allow searching by multiple means. For example, in the case of a library database, that would include searching by any word, by subject, by title, by author, by date, etc.

OPAC (online public access catalog): A library's computerized catalog. OPACs are based on the previously used card catalogs and include all of the information that was available on the cards and, in many cases, additional information, such as book tables of contents.

subject heading: Most libraries arrange materials on the shelves into subject arrangements. This is accomplished by the use of subject categories or headings that are predefined according to the classification system used by the library. Most public and school libraries use the Dewey Decimal System. Most academic research libraries use the Library of Congress System.

Library Catalogs: the Card Catalog

The key to finding information in a library is its catalog. Over the history of libraries, the catalog has taken on numerous forms, from book format, to microfiche, to cards, to online. By far the most common format until the advent of computers and computerized catalogs, the card catalog provided library users with a means for locating materials held in the library's collections in a variety of ways, but usually by author, by title, or by subject. Users looking for a specific book by Ernest Hemingway, for example, would go to the title card catalog and look up the book by its title. Users looking for books by J.R.R. Tolkien would go to the author catalog and look up available materials by author's last name. Researchers looking to find any information in the library's collections dealing with the topic "fantasy literature" would go to the library's subject catalog and look for that subject or cross-references to that subject.

A typical card in the catalog would provide complete bibliographic information on the item. In the case of books, that would include author, title, place of publication, publisher, and date of publication. It would also provide a physical description of the item that might include number of pages, size of the book, and any special features such as illustrations, photographs, etc. Most items would also be assigned subject headings chosen by library catalogers to help classify the items into subject areas in the
