North Carolina Natives The First People of North Carolina

Archaeologists believe that Paleo Indians were the first people to live in North Carolina. Paleo comes from a Greek word meaning "very old." These Native Americans came here around ten to twelve thousand years ago. Paleo Indians were hunters and gatherers. They lived in small groups of about 20 to 50 people. They were nomadic, meaning they moved from place to place. They were often called "nomads" because they did not have a permanent home. They used tools made of stone, bone, and wood. They were also skilled at making clothing from animal skins.

As time passed, Paleo Indians began to live in one place for a long time. They began to grow crops and raise animals. They became more settled and developed a more complex society. They were able to live in one place for a long time because they had learned how to grow crops and raise animals. They were also able to make tools and weapons that were more effective than those of the Paleo Indians.

North Carolina Natives: The First People

They often settled near glacial lakes. These were lakes left behind by large bodies of ice, melted at the end of the Ice Age. Villages, food, tools, and other supplies were readily available.

Paleo Indians were hunters, fishermen, and gatherers. They lived in small groups of about 20 to 50 people. They were nomadic, meaning they moved from place to place. They were often called "nomads" because they did not have a permanent home. They used tools made of stone, bone, and wood. They were also skilled at making clothing from animal skins.

During the winter months, the Paleo Indians depended on three "staples." These crops were corn, beans, and squash. These crops were grown together in a field. The corn provided a source of food. The beans provided a source of protein. The squash provided a source of food and medicine. The Paleo Indians were able to live in one place for a long time because they had learned how to grow crops and raise animals. They were also able to make tools and weapons that were more effective than those of the Paleo Indians.
