Sugimoto Portraits:

Hiroshi Sugimoto: Portraits Hiroshi Sugimoto, 2018-03-27 At first glance Hiroshi Sugimoto's photographic portrait of King Henry VIII of England is arresting his camera has captured the tactility of Henry's luxurious furs and silks the elaborate embroidery of his doublet and the light reflecting off of each shimmering jewel The contours of the king's face are so lifelike that he appears to be almost three dimensional It seems as though the twenty first century artist has traveled back in time nearly five hundred years to photograph his royal subject While Sugimoto's portraits of historical figures appear to capture a lived moment in time they are fictions These portraits are in fact at least twice removed from the subject his photograph captures a wax figure that has been created by a sculptor from either a photographic portrait or a painted one Sugimoto has photographed his portraits of historical subjects in black and white with each sitter posed against a black background giving the images an austere formality The black backdrop free of any props or additional visual information amplifies the illusion that we are viewing a contemporary portrait in which the subject has stepped out of history Other portraits appear to be photojournalistic Sugimoto's image of the Duke of Wellington at Napoleon's deathbed is actually a photograph of the mise en scene created by the wax museum but it registers as real in our minds The portraits of wax figures which in this volume are presented alongside a handful of portraits of living subjects and photographs of memento mori call into question what it is the portrait captures As with his other major bodies of work Dioramas Seascapes Theaters Sugimoto's Portraits address the passage of time and history We recognize these historical figures because of the many contemporaneous drawings paintings sculptures and photographs that have recorded them We take it for granted that a photograph of a living subject is true but what does that mean Are Sugimoto's portraits of living subjects more true than the historical portraits of wax figures Is Hans Holbein's painted portrait of Henry VIII truer than Sugimoto's photograph of the wax figure made from Holbein's painting

The Contingent Object of Contemporary Art Martha Buskirk, 2005-02-18 An exploration of transformations in the nature of the art object and artistic authorship in the last four decades In this book Martha Buskirk addresses the interesting fact that since the early 1960s almost anything can and has been called art Among other practices contemporary artists have employed mass produced elements impermanent materials and appropriated imagery have incorporated performance and video and have created works through instructions carried out by others Furthermore works of art that lack traditional signs of authenticity or permanence have been embraced by institutions long devoted to the original and the permanent Buskirk begins with questions of authorship raised by minimalists use of industrial materials and methods including competing claims of ownership and artistic authorship evident in conflicts over the right to fabricate artists works Examining recent examples of appropriation she finds precedents in pop art and the early twentieth century readymade and explores the intersection of contemporary artistic copying and the system of copyrights trademarks and brand names characteristic of other forms of commodity production She also investigates the ways that connections between work and context have transformed art and institutional conventions the impact of new materials on definitions of medium the role of the document as both primary and secondary object and the significance of conceptually oriented performance work for the intersection of photography and the human body in contemporary art Buskirk explores how artists active in the 1980s and 1990s have recombined strategies of the art of the 1960s and 1970s She also shows how the mechanisms through which art is presented shape not only readings of the work but the work itself She uses her discussion of the readymade and conceptual art to explore broader issues of authorship reproduction context and temporality
