

1 The spoken language

1.0 Preliminaries

In this chapter we shall explore some of the differences in form and in function between spoken and written language. We shall point out that, within spoken language, certain distinctions need to be drawn, because they have an effect on the forms of language which are produced. The bulk of the chapter is devoted to considering the uses to which spoken language is put by native speakers of English, with extensive transcribed illustrations of this use. In the last sections we consider the implications of research findings about the behaviour of native speakers for the teaching of the spoken language to foreign learners.

1.1 Spoken and written language

For most of its history, language teaching has been concerned with the study of the written language. The written language is the language of literature and of scholarship. It is language which is admired, studied, and rich in excellent exemplification. Any well-educated person ought to have access to literature and scholarship in the language he is acquiring. The obvious procedure, it must follow, is to teach him the language through the excellent written models which can be selected and ordered by his teacher.

While the student is acquiring an understanding of the written language of these splendid models on the one hand, on the other he is himself practising the art of producing sentences of the language. An obvious advantage of the written language is that it has been described by generations of grammar-writers and dictionary-makers. There is a comforting sense in which it is possible to say that a written sentence is correct or not. The rules of writing English sentences are really rather well known and well described. Furthermore, written language does not vary greatly over a couple of centuries, and it does not vary very much depending on where it is written. Texts selected for foreign students to study were nearly all written in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries and are selected
