

Glazing

Placing

If unglazed wares were being placed in the kiln, it was simply necessary to stack them one on top of another in such a way as to ensure an even firing throughout the stack. It did not matter if they touched each other, for, being dry, they would not stick together during the firing.

During the medieval period the potter had fired his jugs in short stacks, the glazed rim of one resting against the unglazed base of the next. By this rather crude method the pots tended to stick to one another where they touched, but unless the glaze was particularly tenacious they could be chipped apart fairly easily. A slightly improved method was to place three or four parting sherds (ie small pieces of broken pottery) between the glazed surfaces, thus quite simply reducing the scarring to a minimum. Both techniques sound crude, but they represent the normal practice for placing large jugs, cisterns, bread, or brewing pots in the kiln up to the early years of this century at least. As these wares were always strongly made and coarsely finished the occasional scar at the rim was hardly noticeable, but such methods were totally unsuited to the placing of the finer wares.

The cups and mugs introduced into this country in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries demanded a much more sophisticated treatment, for their fine walls and delicate rims could not withstand either the weight of vertical stacking or the chipping off of the parting sherds. The alternative system developed or adopted by the cup-makers of this period involved the use of saggars—coarsely thrown cylindrical pots large enough to hold a single piece of fine ware each: a cup was placed on the floor of the kiln and a sagger inverted over the top of it, a second cup was then placed on top of the sagger and a second sagger placed over it, the process continuing until a tall stack of full saggars had been built up. Dr Plot in his 1686 Natural History of Staffordshire described how the pots

if they be loaded hollow wares, they [the potters] do not expose them to the naked fire, but put them in draggers, that is, in coarse mettall'd pots, made of waste (not clay) of divers formes according as their wares require . . . they put them in the draggers to keep them from sticking
