Hashtag Awareness: The #BracketAKaNa Trend and Its Implications on the Socialized Tuition System

Dianna Limpin

(1) Following the release of the University of the Philippines' (UP) Socialized Tuition System (STS) results last June 30, 2014, social media platforms – Twitter, in particular – were bombarded with complaints and objections from frustrated students who believed that they were not granted the tuition brackets befitting their financial capacities. Among these complaints surfaced a worldwide twitter trend under the tag #BracketAKaNa (translated, this means "You are now in Bracket A"). Bracket A-sometimes referred to as the "millionaire's bracket" - is the highest-paying tuition bracket under the STS; the households of students under this classification is supposed to have annual net incomes above 1.3 million pesos.

(2) The tweets under the tag #BracketAKaNa became very popular in a relatively short amount of time, leaving the Twitter realm to appear on other social media sites such as Facebook and YouTube, and ultimately, becoming a running joke among UP students. This hype and instant popularity may be attributed to the tweets' largely humorous and satirical nature. For instance, tweets pertaining to the presence of a flush in one's toilet were especially popular due to them amusing and mocking tone.

However, the #BracketAKaNa trend goes beyond humorous appeal; its popularity has more substantial implications with regard to the overall effectiveness of the socialized tuition scheme and the students' perception of the newly implemented STS.

(3) In academic year 2014-2015, the 24-year Socialized Tuition and Financial Assistance Program (STFAP) was replaced by the Socialized Tuition System (STS). In an official announcement on the UP website, it was stated that "UP President Alfredo E. Pascual spearheaded this reform effort when he assumed
