

Process of Reform of Civil-Military Relations, the Democratic Control of Armed Forces and the Security Sector in Albania

Blendi Kajsia

1 Introduction

The process of civil-military relations and security sector reform is very complex since it takes place at different levels and within the context of political, social and economic developments in Albania. The reform process cannot and should be not analyzed in isolation from the larger social context. Of particular importance in the Albanian case is the element of state weakness that reflects itself in every step of the reform process. Another important factor that has conditioned reforms both in the civil-military and the security area is the legacy of the past. This legacy will be dealt with in both cases.

It is important to emphasize that civil-military relations and democratic control of armed forces are an area that is quite separate from the security sector in the case of Albania. The Albanian Constitution of 1998 introduced a new concept to the definition of armed forces. According to this concept the armed forces no longer include the security services and police forces. This step was taken in order to enhance the civil control of the security sector. Therefore, for the purpose of clarity in this paper they will be analyzed separately, although they have many problems in common.

2 Reform of the Military

At the core of the military reform is the establishment of a force with western orientation that is based on professionalism. This means that the peacetime active military units will be mostly based on a professional force, and only a few of them will be completed by the conscript service. The aim is to build a force with an increased operational capability than the actual forces to defend the country's interests, and capable to participate in international operations. A special importance will be given to the joint operations of two or three forces/services, based on 'The Joint Doctrine of the Armed Forces', which has already been prepared but awaits approval. Special units and segments of the armed forces will be able to
