

PROFESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY

I. REGULATION OF THE LEGAL PROFESSION

A. SOURCES OF REGULATION

1. The State

The practice of law, like other professions and businesses, affects the public interest and is, therefore, subject to regulation by the states in the exercise of their police powers.

a. Courts

Because the practice of law is intimately connected with the administration of justice, the courts have the inherent power to regulate the legal profession in and out of court. The ultimate power thus rests with the highest court in the state, not with the state legislature. The highest court generally promulgates the ethics rules and oversees the discipline of lawyers.

1) Ethics Rules—The American Bar Association (“ABA”) Model Rules and Judicial Code

Every state has professional ethics rules that govern the conduct of lawyers, and nearly every state has adopted some version of the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct. Likewise, most states have adopted some version of the ABA Model Code of Judicial Conduct.

2) Case Law

Every state has a body of judge-made case law concerning the rights and duties of lawyers. For example, the case law of a state may limit a lawyer’s ability to enforce a fee contract after being fired by the client.

3) Rules of Court

State courts typically have rules of court with which lawyers must comply. For example, a rule of court may govern the lawyer’s obligation to represent an indigent client at the court’s request.

b. Bar Associations

Each state has an association of lawyers, commonly called the state bar association. A majority of states have an “integrated” bar system, meaning that every lawyer who is admitted to practice in the state must be a member of the state bar association. Common functions of a state bar association are to administer the state’s bar examination, to provide continuing education programs for practicing lawyers, and to assist the state courts in regulating and imposing professional discipline on lawyers.
