The Journalism Manifesto, by B. Zelizer, P. J. Boczkowski & C. W. Anderson, Polity Press, 2022, 122 pp., $45,00 (hardback), ISBN 978-1509542635

The Journalism Manifesto makes a forceful call to journalistic practitioners and scholars to seek greater relevance by taking stock of the field's current trajectory that Zelizer, Boczkowski, and Anderson suggest lacks both connection to audiences and an economically sustainable model. Therefore, the authors suggest upending the reliance on and deference to elite sources, longstanding journalistic norms, and an assumed audience consuming news in any traditional way. Ultimately, they point to a mandate for journalism to undertake extensive reform or commit to revolutionary departure from the field as it stands.

Among their concerns in opening chapter is the fragmentation of audiences (see, Benoit and Billings (2022) for an extended treatment) which has allowed for influencers of various size and degree of reliability to siphon news consumers, disrupt journalistic business models, and generally create havoc for a populace in search of reliable and contextually based information. The success of outlets primarily interested in attracting click-throughs and the algorithmic methods of social media platforms in exposing audiences to information (often disinformation) points to not just the moral and commercial decline of the journalism profession, but its utter destruction.

They argue that journalism currently works from a set of four illusory tenets: (1) illusion of autonomy, (2) illusion of centrality, (3) illusion of cohesion, and (4) illusion of permanence. A detailing of these four is not possible or necessary here, but the illusions collectively limit the ability of journalists to work financially unfettered and to serve a public interested in traditional news content. Part of the illusion is journalistic assumptions that their audience is interested in cooperation toward the public good or even wants the continuing existence of journalism as an institution. In sum, journalism is in disarray. The question remaining is whether a vibrant, relevant, and socially just model for journalism can be built in place of the current morass.

The state of journalism is frankly assessed in chapter 2. Zelizer and colleagues offer a treatment of elite sources acknowledging that the practice is firmly ensconced for many journalists whereby many elites have laid bare their basic incompetence, moral vacuity, and lack of public interest. Government officials, corporate interests, and high-profile interest groups, although certainly working toward particular ends, could once upon a time be assumed as reliable sources of information, but no more. Pointing to examples, such as whistleblowers in the U.S. Department of State's exposure of anti-liberal policies and blatant partisan (as opposed to careerist and professional) behavior, they posit that even an
