

Mean Bones

The doctors call the voices I hear little.
But they're swelling. Hands full of balloons that only say congratulations.
I'm wearing the scraps of a home invasion around my neck, but I'm the one who broke the lock. Who shattered the window. Who bled all over the newly mopped floor.

My brain is just one armed robbery after another.
It's a black widow spider that paranoia is trying to kill with a swig of hairspray, a picture of my mother's hands dissolving into knives. Everything I touch turns to something said too much. Funny: how the words I say the most feel tired.

Hilarious: how everything sounds different when you're scared of that everything.

My father calls me too sensitive, and all I can hear is not worth the worry.
My grandmother admires my heart, how pristine and kind it is. She says, you don't have a mean bone in your body

And I can't bring myself to tell her how cruel all the other parts of me are. How it was all born in a rocking chair, then immediately started clawing at the ground below. How I spit and slap until I splinter. Until all my nice, beautiful bones break.
