

Pacifists

Pacifists opposed the war because they believed that all disagreements should be settled peacefully. Some religious groups, such as Mennonites and Doukhobors, believed in pacifism. As a result, young men from these groups did not enlist. When the conscription law was passed, it did not include members of these groups.

Some other Canadians were also pacifists, even though they did not belong to one of the pacifist religious groups. These pacifists could apply to be excused from combat.
