

The distribution of temperature below a depth of some hundreds of kilometers is unknown: only the broadest of limits can be assigned to its value. Startling as it may seem, it is not even known whether the interior of the earth is heating up or cooling down. Heat flows to the surface of the earth on land and under oceans; radioactivity in crustal rocks can account for much of this heat flow. On the basis of indirect evidence, continental crustal rocks are assumed to be more radioactive than the oceanic rocks: moreover, the average thickness of the crust under continents is five times greater than under oceans. Yet, according to our present scanty data, the mean heat flow per unit area from the oceans is about the same as that from the continents; in both areas it varies by a factor of ten from place to place.

In the modern scientific world, it is perhaps surprising that we have discovered such a vast array of details about the structure and behavior of nuclear particles—including some with incredibly short periods of existence—yet know so little about the earth on which we live, although most facts about the earth's interior have probably changed very little during the entire lifetime of mankind on the planet. This is due in part to lack of application of scientific resources to unlocking the secrets of the earth. But it is also due in no small measure to the nature of the problem. The earth is its own laboratory—its own experiment. Until recently, most of the "surface" of the earth was practically inaccessible: much of the dry land—especially the arctic and antarctic regions—was unexplored; and the two thirds of the solid earth covered by water was quite out of reach for most geophysical investigations.

In recent decades, much of this inaccessibility of the earth's surface has disappeared. The example of recent discoveries in oceanography is relevant. Shut off from the conventional geological approach by miles of sea water, oceanographers have turned to geophysical methods applied over horizontal areas of unprecedented size with all the advantages of mobility and continuity provided by the high seas; a decade of effort has transformed the general picture of ocean-bottom topography, and revealed striking and completely unsuspected patterns of structure and activity. A comparable effort should now be devoted to the study of the details of the earth's crust and mantle beneath both continents and oceans. At present, we know more about the surface of the moon, especially its topography, than we do about the earth's mantle 20 or so miles beneath our feet.

Yet the basic inaccessibility of the earth's interior remains. There is a limit—not greater than one per cent of the earth's radius—below which
