

SONNET. II.

Beauty and Modesty are false of old,
Th' one claims her cheeks, the other claims
his chin;
Then Virtue comes, and puts her toe in (Quoth she) I make him lay th' immortal Gods
(Quoth Modesty) I own his shoulders, his Dime,
His Ups, (quoth Love) his eyes, his hairs is mine
And yet (quoth Modesty) he is not them,
I mine Disdain with Loves congenial share
I, but (quoth Love) his locks are mine thy right
His stately gait is mine (quoth Modesty)
And mine (quoth Virtue) is his Modesty.
Thus as they strive about this heavenly weight,
At last the other two to Virtue yield,
The Dims of Love, fought in their Beauties field,

SONNET. III.

He Swicks thinks, (and they once were the weak)
That virtue is the chiefest good of all,
The Academics on Idus call.
The Epicures in pleasure spend their youth,
The Peripateticks judge Silence,
To be the chiefest good above all other,
One man, thinks thus; and that conceives another:
So that in one thing very few agree.
Let Socrates have their Virtue if they will,
And all the rest their choice-supposed good,
Let cruel Martians delight in blood,
And Myers lay their bags with gold to fill:
My chiefest good, my chiefest felicity,
Is to be gazing on my loves faire eye.

SONNET. IV.

We were then as in one faire ferment,
Of some incited Gargander sweet fart,
Which other stars in brightness doe dispart,
As much as Pe in Chastities pursuit Tame.
But are they common natur'd stars: for why,
Those stars when other shine wale their pure light,
And when all other vanish out of sight,
They add a glory to the worlds great eye.
By these two stars my life is nicely led,
In them I place my joy, in them my pleasure,
Love's piercing Darts, and Nature's precious treasure
With their sweet fode my bristling woe is fed:
Then when my sunne is absent from my sight
How can it thine (with me) but be dark night?

SONNET. V.

It is reported of faire Tier Sonnet,
A little famous for his civility,
His noble minde and magnanimity,
That when the Trojan wars were new begun,
Whom'ter was deepe-wounded with his speare,
Could never be recovered of his wound,
Nor ever after be made whole againe:
Except with that speares point he helpe was.
Even so it tarth with my fatefull woe,
Who being wounded with his piercing eye,
Must rather thereby finde a remedy,
Or els to be releas'd, I know not how.
Then if thou hast a minde still to annoy me,
Kill me with kisses, if thou wilt destroy me.
